Knowledge of Void

The travelers pass through a long, upward climbing tunnel and come out into a delightful land of trees and brooks with scattered cottages. Looking about they see that it was lit by a clear light without a source and an apparent lack of inhabitants, or indeed any moving objects at all.

This parallels the discovery that virtual knowledge does not depend on stored experience but is defined by absence in context rather than presence. Deja vue or anamnesis can exist in familiar as well as in new contexts.
